Curatorial Remarks:
Born in 1973 in New Jersey, George Boorujy attended the University of Miami in order to pursue a career as a marine biologist, but turned to art and in 1996 received a B.F.A. degree in painting. After traveling extensively, Boorujy enrolled in graduate school and earned an M.F.A. from School of Visual Arts in New York in 2002. He now lives and works in Brooklyn. Boorujy’s art explores people’s relationship to the environment, especially their interaction with and perception of wildlife. He has exhibited widely, both nationally and internationally, and is a member of the fine arts faculty at the School of Visual Arts in New York City. This colored ink study by Boorujy relates to the Audubon Mural Project, the public art initiative of the National Audubon Society, in partnership with the Harlem-based Gitler & _____ Gallery on the Upper West Side of Manhattan. While the project is inspired by the legendary artist John James Audubon (a former resident of the neighborhood, then called “Carmansville”), it is energized by recent findings from the National Audubon Society that nearly half of all North American bird species will face dire threats to their survival by 2080 due to global warming. The project has been commissioning artists to paint murals of each of the threatened species—a total of 314—throughout Hamilton Heights and Washington Heights. To date over 100 embellish local buildings. The mural at 560 West 157th Street is one of three Booruhy painted in the mural series. These often monumental murals beautify the historic neighborhood and bring attention to a critically important environmental crisis in the spirit of John James Audubon. For the project see: https://www.audubon.org/amp. Two other works related to murals are in the collection (2019.87.1 and 2019.87.3).
